Do you have hands instead of feet on your legs? Long, agile fingers at the ends instead of stubby, clumsy toes? Have trouble fitting into regular shoes like conventional, toe-legged people? Here are some ideas for leg-hand-wear, designed for the modern polycheiric woman like you.

The Challenges Of Walking On Hands

You need handwear, not footwear. You want shoes designed for the shape of your backhands, combining walking comfort with style. And your legfingers are versatile, even when you are not holding things with them: unlike the toelegs, you can adopt a range of standing and walking postures, to suit the situation. Palms flat to the floor? On the tips of your leg-fingers? Leghands formed into fists so you can rest on your knuckles?

Fist Stance

You will find that shoes for your walking hands come in a great variety, too.

Strap-Slippers

Probably the simplest style. Note the individual straps between the fingers, to spread the weight of your body and minimize chafing. Available in a range of heel heights, or as flats. Easy to put on: just spread your fingers and slide your hands in! And easy and quick to take off, to free up an extra hand from walking or standing, to use for holding, any time you need it. You've got more than two hands, and you know how to use them!

Finger-Straps

Can also be ordered with extra straps, for those with more than the usual number of fingers.

Gripping Shoes

This style of shoe really shows off what you can do with leghands. Wrap your legfingers around the handles, under the straps, and hold on, with the weight of your body resting against the palms of your backhands. Straps are convenient so you don't always need to hold tight to keep them from coming off, but strapless designs are also available, for a more minimalistic look. The special cushion designs provide maximum comfort for walking.

The Walking Grip

Do you wish sometimes you had regular feet? Do you get the occasional bout of envy of toelegs and the high heels they can wear? You won't any more, with these in your wardrobe!

Closed Boots

Perhaps the closest to the style of conventional toeleg footwear, these are for when you don't immediately need to use your extra hands as hands, but plan to do a lot of walking. Looks like a toe-legged boot, but is specially shaped and padded inside for hand-legged comfort. Just make your hind hands into fists, and slip them in.

When These Hands Are Just For Walking

They're also useful when you want to be discreet about being hand-legged. With these, people who didn't already know won't even notice your unusual physical attributes. Not these particular physical attributes, anyway.

Walking Gloves

Need walkwear that's a little bit more rugged? Yet still want to keep those back fingers free? Here's a shoe that's also a glove, leaving each individual finger free to move independently.

It's A Shoe For Your Fingers

This is a good choice if you have to be someplace not conducive to walking around in bare skin, but still need the use of all your hands.

Specify number of fingers.

Fingerless Pads

For when even slippers are too inconvenient to put on and take off, but you don't want to go completely unshod. These at least keep your palms clean, while leaving your fingers exposed.

Compromise Protection

No Shoes At All

Or why not go barefooted? Or is that barehanded? Do you want to leave your leghands unencumbered, so you can use them like hands? Hard to believe, but it wasn't that long ago that shoes for walking hands didn't exist, so you had to go that way, all the time. But in today's modern times, the choice is up to you!
